Baby Briton Packs a Mean Wallop

London, England,-Maybe these side glances at the Wembly coronation fete baby show held here recently will convince the English that baby contests ought to be conducted under Marquis of Queensbury rules. At Then the thing of which I'm the left, one of the youngsters, evidently disputing the right of another to compete, seems to be saying (in baby talk), "Scram, you, and let a real baby compete!" At the right, the future pugilist is probably adding, "Well, if you aren't a baby, bawling over a little sock like that!"

 Clergyman's Reception Needn't Bore Anybody

D EAR Mrs. Post: I am one of the committee in charge of giving a reception for our new clergyman and his wife. It has been suggested by one of the women that we have a musical program first, after which the newcomers will receive and then everyone go downstairs to the large Sunday-school room to have refreshments. I personally think such an arrangement might prove drawn out and awkward but I don't know what better plan to suggest. Answer: I think the combination of a welcoming reception and a musical program requiring everyone to sit in silence is exactly what you describe as awkward. If I were managing it, I would have the entire reception in the Sunday-school room, which you say is ample, where one or two members on the committee would receive with the clergyman and his wife and introduce parishioners to them. Several stringed instruments playing softly as a background for conversation would be delightful. This arrangement could not prove tiring since after people have spoken to those receiving they would stand around in groups talking to one another and be served with refreshments As newcomers arrive the first-comers-if they grow tired-would be free to leave.

Sane Reducing of Weight

DR. JAMES W. BARTON @ Bell Syndicate.-WNU Service.

"IF THE amount of food taken is greater than necessary to provide fuel for the energy that is used or expended, the excess food is really the source of the accumulation of fat in the body; if the amount taken equals the amount required for the energy needs of the body, the weight remains stationary; if the amount is less than required to

When to Reduce Diet. Likewise it is more sensible to reduce the diet of an individual who regularly overeats than that of one who is a small eater, because there s a limit beyond which it is unsafe to further reduce the food intake. It seems simple enough to outline a diet containing a definite number of calories or heat units, which being less than is being eaten at presvidual because each body handles

Principles of Treatment. Dr. Blum tells us that certain general principles are noteworthy in tatoes, bread, sugar-are "fattening" foods. They have high caloric values and in laying out the diet for overweight the quantities of such foods should be limited or reduced

3. Some kinds of food have small caloric values. Such foods are green vegetables, fibrous vegetables-cellean meats. They may be taken in larger quantities by overweights. 4. Some varieties of food, while not directly apt to put on weight, stimulate the digestive glands and increase the appetite. Such foods include highly seasoned, spiced, and preserved foods. They should be avoided entirely by overweights.

5. Some foods are indigestible and should, therefore, be avoided. "In conjunction with the diet or food treatment of overweight other measures may be employed; for example purgation (Epsom salts and other purgatives), massage (a method used for athletes and movie stars), increased amount of exercise, and hot, steam, Turkish, electric light, and other kinds of baths. But in general, the best results will be obtained by sticking closely to the food regulations outlined above. People do not become fat from what they do not eat."
